

Motivation	Example
Technology improvements during research and development	The analyst may predict that equipment may be better automated for a flight, thereby reducing the crewtime requirement.
Gravity conditions	The level of gravity during different phases of a mission will affect equipment structural strength requirements, and may drive modification of processes to accommodate differences in phase separation, convection and other characteristics.
Dust conditions	Equipment exposed to the Mars surface may require modification to enable operation during dust storms.
Sunlight conditions	A Mars greenhouse may require some degree of artificial lighting in order for plants (that have evolved in Earth conditions) to acceptably thrive.
Planetary protection requirements	If implemented on the Mars surface, technologies that vent gas to the external environment may require modification to prevent the release of possible biomarkers (in interest of the integrity of the search for life on the Mars surface).
Radiation conditions	It may be necessary to modify hardware materials to those which are less susceptible to radiation damage.
Launch forces	Equipment might be required to survive 3 g during launch from Earth. Parts of a technology (brittle materials, delicate instruments, fragile connections, etc.) may also be susceptible to launch vibratory forces, therefore requiring modification.
Noise level & associated frequency requirements	Locations without an atmosphere external to the habitat (e.g. LEO) will have more stringent constraints on noise levels and associated noise frequencies.
Safety requirements	Safety devices may be needed to bring equipment to a greater (i.e. flight-ready) safety level or to bring options in a trade study to comparable safety levels.
Availability requirements	Redundant equipment may be necessary to increase equipment availability or to bring options in a trade study to comparable availability levels.
