This is done by filling the component with a liquid and applying a pressure to it. The pressure is then gradually increased until the component fails. The pressure at which failure occurs is then compared with the design pressure to determine the safety factor.

The second of these is the fatigue test, in which the component is subjected to a cyclic loading. This is done by applying a load to the component which varies sinusoidally between a maximum and a minimum value. The number of cycles to failure is then determined and compared with the design life.

These elements are used to insulate the stator windings from the rotor windings. They are made of a special paper which is impregnated with a resin. The resin is applied to the paper by a process called vacuum impregnation. This process involves placing the paper in a vacuum chamber and then applying a resin to it. The resin is then drawn into the paper by the vacuum.
