

Campbell Biology
Chapter 51: Animal Behavior

A1: The How and Why of Animal Activity

- Animal behavior is based on physiological systems and processes
- Male fiddler crabs have one large claw that makes up half of its mass, and they use it for attracting mates and for eating algae
- An individual behavior is an action carried out by muscles under control of the nervous system
- Behaviors are important for acquiring nutrients and finding a mate, and contributes to homeostasis
- Animal physiology contributes to behavior, and behavior influences physiology
- Since anatomy is changed by evolution, behavior is as well

A1: Discrete Sensory Inputs can Stimulate Both Simple and Complex Behaviors

- Biologists attempt to understand the stimulus that elicits the behavior, physiological mechanisms that mediate the response, growth and development experience influencing response, how the behavior aids survival and reproduction, as well as the behavior's evolutionary history
- Proximate causation is how a behavior occurs or is modified
- Ultimate causation is why a behavior occurs in the context of natural selection
- Behavioral ecology is the study of ecological and evolutionary basis for animal behavior, and it is based on ultimate causation

A2: Fixed Action Patterns

- Fixed action patterns are sequences of unlearned acts directly linked a simple stimulus, and are unchangeable and are carried to completion
- Fixed action patterns include how male sticklebacks become aggressive to anything with a red underside
- The trigger for a behavior is an external cue known as a sign stimulus

A3: Migration

- Environmental stimuli not only trigger behaviors but also serve as cues for animals to carry out such behaviors
- Environmental cues are used guide migration, which is a regular, long-distance change in location
- Migrating animals pass through unknown environments when migrating, so they use track their position relative to the sun and adjust for the changing position of the sun by means of their circadian clock
- A circadian clock is an internal mechanism that maintains a 24-hour activity rhythm or cycle
- Migratory birds orient differently according to the position of the sun, and they can detect the magnetic field to guide themselves when the sun is obscured

A4: Behavioral Rhythms

- The circadian clock influences circadian rhythm, which is a daily cycle of rest and activity, and it is influenced by light and dark cycles even under constant conditions like hibernation
- Migration and reproduction are rhythms with longer cycles than circadian rhythms
- Rhythms linked to seasons are known as circannual rhythms and are correlated with food availability, even though they are influenced by periods of daylight and darkness
- Rhythms can also be linked to tides or lunar phases, especially in crab reproduction

A5: Animal Signals and Communication

- A stimulus transmitted from one organism to another is called a signal, an example of which is claw waving to call over female crabs
