

Chapter 53: Population Ecology

To understand human population growth, we must consider the general principles of population ecology.

population => group of individuals of a single species that live in the same general area; same resources, similar environmental factors, high likelihood of interacting and breeding

Two main characteristics of a population:

- ♦ density => number of individuals per unit area or volume; counting or estimating (count random plots and average, mark-recapture)

$$\frac{\text{Number marked in second sample}}{\text{Total caught in second sample}} = \frac{\text{Number marked in first sample}}{\text{Size of whole population (N)}}$$

Results from birth, immigration, mortality, emigration.

- ♦ dispersion => pattern of spacing
 1. clumped => aggregate in patches (most common)
 2. uniform => evenly spaced (territoriality or chemical secretion)
 3. random => position of each individual is independent of the others, and spacing is unpredictable (seed spread)

clumped

The factors that influence density and dispersion of a population also influence other aspects of a population such as vital statistics.

Demography => study of vital statistics of populations and how they change over time (birth/death rates)
