Accidence of Hebrew Grammar Henry a Coffey,2017-05-14 Excerpt from Accidence of Hebrew Grammar With Exercises The chief difficulties that face one entering on the study of Hebrew arise from the number and instability of the masoretic points and the changes incident to the weak, quiescent, and guttural letters. The aim to lessen these difficulties will explain most of the departures in the following pages from what might otherwise seem a more logical method of treatment. The plan, therefore, has been to insist mainly on the verbs and to explain the elements only as they are needed for immediate use in the paradigms, introducing other portions of the accidence at the point where they seemed to fit in best or were required for the exercises or where it was desired to dwell for a longer time on the verb that is being studied The whole question of half open syllables and intermediate shewa has been left untouched The avoidance of the needless confusion and discouragement they cause was thought sufficient warrant for omitting what for the present are at best matters of uncertainty The same motive will also explain the absence of certain other technicalities in pronunciation and transliteration
