Breakable Barbara Cotter,2004 This exegesis is presented as an accompaniment to an exhibition of jewellery and objects It contains an exploration of ideas associated with the works as well as a technical record of how I produced those works My research began with an interest in the relationships that develop between the human body and jewellery With direct reference to my own body I primarily explore the narrative aspects of jewellery by questioning the role of wearability and its relationship to corporeality I consider the narrative potential of jewellery through engagement with discussions by predominantly Sue Rowley and Janet Hoskins Utilising personal narratives throughout this research project I focus on the techniques of enamelling With reference to writings by Tracey Rosolowski and Kevin Murray I expand on the notion of wearability and jewellery's relationship to the body Due to my interest in the active participation of the maker during the making process and the relationships they develop to their chosen materials the theories of Ellen Dissanayake and Bruce Metcalfe and the art making practices of Catherine Trueman Sue Lorraine Patricia Piccinini and Kild Smith have been explored Over the course of my research the focus moved from the exterior surface of the body to include its interior its blood bones sinews and muscles Beginning with the metaphor of the blood that surges through my veins and stains my work I use analogies of the organs and tissues of the body as a way of exploring the intimate relationship jewellery and objects can establish with the body of the maker and or wearer and to consider the vulnerability of the body and its ability to heal
