Consequently, researchers consider the potential for feedback theory to serve as the primary mechanism for this. They argue that a community's potential resilience is determined by its structure, self-organization, and self-reinforcing feedbacks.

Consequently, there is a new demand for a common culture and a new culture horizon. This horizon is the horizon of transnational culture, a new transnational perspective in transnational regions (Adorno 1998, 2000). Transnational regions are regions in which the regions are not limited to their own borders.
