

Answers to Student Review Problems

Dealing with Consumers Part A: General Protections

1. Why do consumers deserve extra legal protection?

- Consumers are at a disadvantage when dealing with a business
- Business knows more about their products than the consumer
- Business has more business experience and greater access to resources
- Traditional rules of contract law are generally based on 'caveat emptor' and therefore offer little assistance to consumers.
- There is no real equality of bargaining power between business and consumer
- So, legislation seeks to protect consumers

2. What needs to be proved in an action for breach of ACLs 18 (prohibiting misleading and deceptive conduct)?

- Business has 'engaged in conduct': this includes acts, statements, promises, the failure to do or say something. It also includes silence (Henjo Investments v Collins Marrickville)
- The conduct was 'in trade or commerce'. The conduct must therefore be in a commercial context, and does not cover political or academic statements
- The conduct was 'misleading or deceptive or likely to mislead or deceive'. For this it is necessary to use the objective test which is done by reference to the target audience. Statements that are literally true may be misleading. Exaggerations may or may not be misleading or deceptive depending on the context

3. Can ACLs 18 be enforced by persons other than consumers?

Apart from consumers, interested members of the public and other businesses, including competitors, may seek to enforce ACLs 18

4. What are the consequences of contravening ACLs 18?

- There are no criminal penalties
- However, the ACCC may issue notices or warnings
