

The European Influences on Pope's The Rape of the Lock

Alexander Pope's mock epic The Rape of the Lock portrays a common scenario of aristocrat society in the seventeenth century. Literature during the 17th and 18th century was not only influenced by culture but also social, political, language and many other aspects of society. The epic poem The Rape of the Lock is one of his masterpieces where Alexander Pope demonstrates a significant European influences. He portrays the wealthy lifestyle of the upper class people using mockery. He used many words and elements in a statistic way to mock them. As a result, the mention of Ombre, the allusions to Le Comte de Gabalis, and his word selection in this poem all illustrate the European influence.

Ombre, a card game is introduced in the third canto in the poem The Rape of the Lock. It's a fashionable game in the restoration period and in the eighteenth century. The poet tries to depict the elegance and handsomeness of the wealthy society in Europe at that time. Thus, this game can mainly be seen as having European influences. In essence, this card game was invented in Spain somewhere in the early seventeenth century. There were uses of foreign words in Shakespeare, Chaucer, Spenser, Rochester's writing in English literature. Alexander Pope, like other poets, started borrowing words from Greek, Latin and French languages and implied them in his writing. 'Ombre' is one of them which is essentially derived from the Spanish phrase 'Hombre'. He shows in the poem that this Spanish game is played between Belinda and Baron sitting at a table which indicates that this game maybe considered as a medium of pastime. In fact, many people believe that this game is the most popular card game which needs careful attention, a decent amount of time, and more practice. Pope complied, treating the participants as if they were fighting the Trojan War, the epic battle between Greeks and Trojans in the 12th or 13th centuries. Although, it was a simple card game but the acuity of this game ultimately resulted in the "rape" of Belinda's lock. In this context, rape is a strong word whereas a lock is simply a mass of hair. The amount of hair hanging from the front of the face is presented as mockery in a contradictory way because how can a piece of hair represent the artificiality, elitism, respect, and dignity of the elite ladies? But here, the Pope portrayed the game as a sign of social status among the aristocratic people in England. He showed how Europe's elite were unable to see beyond trivialities at the time. Thus, he preferred to use the word 'Ombre' instead of the English word chess in this epic.
