

increase in ridership of about 30 percent; however, this increase does not necessarily correlate with a decrease in car traffic. Evidence suggests that when buses and subways are free, people often take bus and train trips they would not have taken otherwise while still using their cars nearly as much as they did before. In 2013 Tallinn, Estonia, instituted fare-free rides for city residents (becoming the largest city in the world to do so), but car use in Tallinn has only slightly 14 declined, as a 2014 study by the KTH Royal Institute of Technology in Sweden found that car traffic in Tallinn was down less than 3 percent since 15 it was enacted.

Instituting a fare-free system 16 can also have a devastating effect on a city's transportation budget. All public transportation systems are subsidized by the government to some extent, but large systems gain a substantial portion of their operating revenue from fares. Since systems that go fare-free see increases in ridership, they often must operate more buses and trains and hire more drivers and other personnel at the same time that they are losing a key source of funding. Advocates of fare-free policies claim that the costs of these policies are largely offset by various 17 savings, however, a recent study comparing projected results of fare-free policies in different cities found this outlook to be 18 way too sunny. For example, in San Francisco, CA, fare-free public transit was projected to save $3.4 million per year in fare collection costs 19 but create a

NO CHANGE

This choice includes a punctuation error: a colon (:) is used where a comma (,) would be appropriate. The word "as" can't be used to link an independent clause ("car use in Tallinn has only slightly declined") to a dependent clause ("as a 2014 study by the KTH Royal Institute of Technology in Sweden found that car traffic in Tallinn was down less than 3 percent since it was enacted"). Notice that the second clause begins with a subordinating conjunction "as"—it can stand alone as a sentence.

The is the best choice. The colon correctly connects the two clauses, and the punctuation is correct. The information that illustrates what has changed is the second clause. The independent clause that follows provides evidence for the statement before the colon. The sentence "car use in Tallinn has only slightly declined" is a complete sentence.

Note that choice A is incorrect. Scroll for more questions
