Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 6-week training program on the physical fitness of sedentary middle-aged men. The subjects were divided into two groups: control and experimental. The experimental group underwent a supervised exercise program consisting of aerobic and resistance training. Physical fitness was assessed using a variety of tests, including heart rate, blood pressure, body composition, and functional performance. Results showed significant improvements in all measures of physical fitness in the experimental group compared to the control group.
