2.1. Identifying the signal of stress

How do we identify the signal of stress? And how does the brain respond to this signal? (stressors leading to activation of stress genes)

3. these signals, which are stronger in the nucleus, which respond with an activated neuronal output
 - o the brain sends homeostatic instructions for peripheral cells to deal with the stressor
4. the brain activates internal feedback, cellular output, and other inputs
 - o the brain sends homeostatic instructions and there feedback there are connected in the endocrine system as a means of feedback loop for a more specific response to the stressor
 - o the brain sends internal instructions, but they are not sent back there, giving feedback there
5. the brain sends internal instructions, but they are not sent back there, but they give internal signals to glands, so endocrine system
 - o the brain sends internal instructions that activate the endocrine system, which then sends internal signals back to the brain
 - o the brain sends internal signals and the endocrine system sends signals back to the brain, giving feedback to the brain
6. the brain sends internal signals for the endocrine system, which then sends internal signals back to the brain, which then sends internal signals back to the brain, giving feedback to the brain
