Finding Their Voices Amy Lou Busch, 1999 The few studies that exist on battered women who have killed focus on what psychologists attorneys and academics have to say about their conduct To date there has been no study of how the women perceive themselves and their actions and how they feel about the labels that have been applied to them The voices of women who have killed their abusers must be brought into this debate The life stories of these women can inform the theory used to describe them illuminating disjunctions between the battered woman syndrome and their own explanations for their actions

Battered Woman Syndrome Mindy Beth Mechanic, 1996 The purpose of the present research was to address two broad questions related to the use of expert testimony in battered women s homicide cases First what do laypersons know about battering and in what ways is that knowledge tied to conceptually similar attitudinal constructs such as sex roles adversarial beliefs about women and support for the use of violence against women Second what is the impact of expert testimony on juror decision making in a simulated battered woman s homicide case Do prior knowledge of domestic violence and beliefs about the acceptability of woman battering affect receptivity to expert testimony or influence the decision making process Results from the first study provide preliminary psychometric support for the development of a measure to assess lay knowledge of battering Using the known groups method initial evidence of validity was demonstrated The measure was found to have adequate reliability Evidence of discriminant validity was obtained by showing the measure to be only marginally associated with related attitudinal and sex role constructs Substantive findings suggest that while there is a subset of information about battering that is common knowledge and an equally small domain of misinformation there is inconsistency in knowledge about the majority of information Results from study two emphasize the limited impact of expert testimony on juror decision making in a battered women s homicide case Long standing individual difference factors were influential in shaping the decision making process and the verdicts rendered In addition findings underscore confusion between constructs related to excuse vs justification in battered women s homicide cases
