

From a cognitive and propositional view, the condition "consciousness" is synonymous with "the state of the organism's cognitive capacity as reflected by its percept and perceptual, cognitive and linguistic behavior." This is a very broad definition, but it includes most prior theoretical constructs, though incomplete, and most common linguistic usages. In addition, the word "conscious" is often used in a colloquial and linguistic sense, as in "conscious" (unconscious) state, or "conscious" (unconscious) action. These common usages, however, usually apply to the organism as a whole, though often, especially in an colloquial but also in biological contexts, they apply to the mind or to the nervous system. However, the notion from the traditional cognitive sciences, such as psychology and cognitive linguistics, is the systematic mapping of memory. Thus implies that "conscious" (unconscious) is used here referring either to the mind or the nervous system. In this sense, "conscious" means "consciousness," or "the mind," or "the nervous system." The following more specific sense, which will often, and probably not the best, serve the purpose of the present paper, is the "conscious" (unconscious) organism. I have already made an important note about the latter phrase. However, you should not expect to find here any other than a very narrow and precise sense.
