Computer Browsing History Issues

This section should be concerned with the legal implications of using, reviewing and the issues regarding subpoenas for the viewing of the contents of a computer's browsing history. There are significant legal issues involving a so-called "browsing history" since this contains images and "memorized" pages. The issue is governmental authority, on the basis of "other" to conduct these reviews on the computer's contents. There are two main issues for authority, being that to search for specific items based on the "memorized" contents. There are two main issues for authority, being that to search for specific items based on the "memorized" contents, there are general and related issues of "surfing" for evidence, and there are the general issues for the other authority powers/privileges issues for the contents the user of the computer's contents.

Issues that are raised are the various items that are stored by the computer user by "surfing" on the Internet, a user goes to one site to view information, then visits the homepage, viewing the contents of many other sites, then returns to the computer and makes no specific further requests.

If requested for a specific computer's contents, the evidence seized off memory, also appears in the history, the specific information does not have to be seized.
