These efforts to disseminate the concepts of environmental thought in China and to link environmentalists to decision-makers in the central government, although limited in their effectiveness, nevertheless, served as an important step in the environmental movement. Thus the efforts of Chinese environmentalists to promote the environmental and ecological cause have been taking off from their original stages as the movement from environmentalists' grass-roots organizations, which were not well-organized, small-scale organizations and individuals, to environmental associations, large organizations. This growing importance of environmental organizations, especially their role in environmental movements, is reflected in the following statement by Wang Jiaxiang, former environmentalist leader, in his speech at the 1992 World Conference on Environment and Development:

11. Leucosia (Leucosia) leucosia (Linnaeus, 1758) (Fig. 11)

11. What is the primary purpose of the following statement?

During other discussions with the government they in the various delegations, as indicated above, have indicated the following: they do not intend to withdraw, and they do not consider that they have been given any assurances that they will not do so, except those assurances, which I repeat, that they do not consider that they have been given any assurances that they will not do so, except those assurances which they have given themselves.

11. What is the primary purpose of the following statement?

Other sources distinguish three types of evaluations that may be used in this context. These three however, rather than being three distinct evaluations, are often performed over time and therefore represent three different yet related processes, namely the making of initial estimates, developing projections, and reassessments. These three types of evaluations are used to evaluate the current situation, identify possible options and to make projections of the future based on different kinds of assumptions. The different processes involve the development of concepts concerning the future, testing of predictions, and other methods used for reassessments.
