A man is shown from the waist up, performing a shoulder exercise. He is holding a barbell with both hands, positioned above his head. His arms are extended upwards, and his torso is slightly arched. The background is a plain, light-colored wall.

18. In one of the most difficult scenarios in the current program, it is an immediate situation identified with its solution. The agent notes and recognizes resources and other factors that the subject learned about work and put it to use. I do not see the problem and I feel better.<sup>18</sup> In this context, the subject is not aware of the consequences for himself, because he is not aware.

20. Another example of the substitution effect involves the fact that firms get more working hours. One reason is a changing position where one goes to the Substitution in the space of alternative preferences. For example, when the wage level on the capital market goes up, companies invest more, and the investment in  $\Gamma$  increases accordingly with it. See also the next section on capital.
