

Laboratory Exercise 10 – Soundness of the System

Background

George Boole's Investigation of the Laws of Thought presents all the elements for what is today considered the mathematical basis for the pure logic. Boole was able to show that all mathematical propositions could be derived from two types of basic propositions, which were called affirmative and negative propositions. Boole's logic system was a propositional logic, while today including quantification operations. A quantification is a function that takes an individual element (i.e., a given term) of a domain and returns a Boolean value (i.e., a result was true or false). In fact, the following result is for quantification (i.e., quantifying over values) in a propositional logic system. In Boole's logic, the following will be true, in general, only when all the variables, which Boole's logic called atomic elements, are true. The following table is written in simplified logic. The symbol $\neg$ represents not in a propositional logic system and $\wedge$ represents and in a propositional logic system. The question mark (?) is used only for non-quantification in the $\mathcal{P}$ proposition and the symbol $\forall$ is the $\mathcal{P}$ (i.e., forall) quantifier. The $\mathcal{P}$ variable is assumed to be true in propositional logic. Quantification should be thought of as quantification over atomic elements. The law is the Law of Quantification, which states that the variables (i.e., individuals) over which the quantification is performed, and that only the atomic elements are true are represented. It is in general:

Boole's Law of Quantification

The quantification of Boole's law is the Law of the Proposition in his theory that the law states that a propositional element must only be quantified. Boole's law of quantification is written as follows. This law can be written as follows: quantifying over atomic elements in Boole's system is quantifying over atomic elements in a propositional logic system.
