

... "These relationships have been well known within the geological literature for many years, although perhaps somewhat less well known in general, and there are more differences than common similarities, in terms of the different definitions and models."

What additional steps should be taken to promote wider recognition of these findings?

Geologists - "Geologists today, mostly through geological surveys" - believe "we need to consider" these findings.

Geographers - "Geographers are not yet fully aware of these findings."

Geographers are concerned with the "long-term processes and consequences" of these findings for predictions.

Geographers "have been applying a number of existing processes, growth, decline, and fluctuation, to different types of environmental systems."

Geographers "have a different way of looking at environmental systems, particularly environmental systems, which are regional scale."
